IRELAND'S WOMEN IN THE PAST.

From a little experience during the past few days apropos my remarks on a particular class of young ladies, I am convinced that the erroneous idea about the tradition of Irish womanhood as something opposed to modern progress is very prevalent among our "educated" classes. They find it almost impossible of belief when they hear stated that women were free and in most respects on a level with men here in Ireland at a time when they were treated as mere slaves or the playthings of men in England and other countries. Equally with men, women were guests at Tara and at the feasts of other kings and nobles, though as a rule they sat at separate tables, and, sometimes, at a table in a separate hall. There is abundant evidence to show that women shared in the education of their age to the full.

The Druids freely admitted women into their cult and indoctrinated them with all the lore of their mystery and magic. In the sixth century girls were taught Latin at the school of Clonard. More than thirteen hundred years ago music was more generally and more highly cultivated among the women of Ireland than among the women of any other country. It is on record that the Abbess Gertrude of Nivello, in Belgium, had to avail of the assistance of two Irish saints (St. Follan and St. Ullan) to instruct her nuns in psalmody. What the social status of women in England was in those ancient days when the women of Elre were taking part in every great national assembly which combined the social functions of a court, the sittings of a parliament, the meeting of academics of art and literature, and musical entertainments is well known to every student of history.

The principal duties of home consisted in grinding the corn, preparing food, spinning wool and linen, dyeing and making garments. In the higher ranks women were chiefly employed in works of art such as embroidery and artistic needlework. They had special councils to deal with women's affairs, and no man was allowed to be present.

At the fairs of Carman and Taltain they had special games suited to themselves and they were interested spectators when the muscular prowess of the sons of Elre was tested in athletic championships, hurling contests and outdoor sports of all kinds.

Up to recently English law denied the right of married women to own property, but in ancient Ireland married women were not only permitted to retain full control of their own property, but were also entitled to a share in any increment on the same footing as their husbands. A study of ancient Irish history supplies convincing evidence of the enviable position the women of Ireland held compared with other countries.—Seamus, in Waterford News.

THE IMMIGRANT'S LAST LETTER.

Farwell, Nora darling, this is the last letter That you will receive from the hands of your boy. Death's summons has called me, I cannot get better. And, ah! in the days of my youth I must die.

I must die afar away from the scenes of my childhood, Yes, far away from old Erin and you. We shall meet nevermore at our haunts in the wildwood. Where at evening we told our love, constant and true.

There we built our bright castles nor thought of the morrow. For love ruled the hour in our hearts young and light. But, ah! on the light heart falls heaviest sorrow. And the hopes of a lifetime are crushed in a night.

I thought of you, Nora, when crossing the billow, And somehow my heart always turned to thee. And at night when I lay on the hard steamer's pillow, I dreamed, Nora darling, you were sailing with me.

And, oh, what a pleasure I had in my slumber. For I thought you were standing once more by my side, And I kissed your soft cheek and your lips without number. Those sweet lips that told me you'd soon be my bride.

The hand of the stranger is kind to me, Nora, God bless them, they've done all that mortals could do, And the words of the priest like the lamp of Aurora, Throws a light in the valley that I'm passing through.

I cannot forget you, though death steals round me. Your face like an angel's is ever in my view. When my spirit takes flight, may it roam o'er the wide sea, And be with my people, my country and you. —John L. Walsh.

A WONDERFUL IMPROVER.

F. H. Elliott, the secretary of the American Automobile association, laughed, at a dinner in New York, over some of the absurd claims made against automobilists.

"If an automobile runs over a pig," he said, "it is sure to be a blooded Berkshire. Every chicken slaughtered is a pedigree bird worth $40 or $50. A yellow baynard can be a white-haired fox terrier. A calf is always of Alderney of Guernsey blood."

Mr. Elliott smiled. "To tell the truth," he said, "nothing seems to improve livestock like crossing with an automobile." —Detroit Free Press.

THE LITERARY TRAMP.

H. Rider Haggard was traveling across the United States as the guest of John Hays Hammond in Hammond's private car.

"What I want to see," said Haggard, "is the real tramp. I haven't seen one since I reached this country. I can't believe you have as many as has been stated to be the case."

Harris Hammond, the eldest son of John Hays, promised: "I'll show you one at the next stop."

He had seen one riding on the trucks under the car, and at the next station he went down and called the hobo out. When the tramp entered the car he was covered with cinders and dirt, and looked like something from the lower regions.

Hammond shook hands with him, and introduced him, saying: "This is Mr. Rider Haggard."

"Rider Haggard!" exclaimed the hobo. "Why, I've read all of your books, and loved every one of them." Then he sat down and discussed literature with Haggard for half an hour. At the end of the talk Harris took him back, let him get some of the dust and cinders off, and handed him a good cigar.

"That fellow's not a tramp," said Haggard. "He's a gentleman in distress." —Popular Magazine.
